ABSTRACT

This document presents a classification of the campus resources of higher education institutions in the United States. After the foreword, the institutions are divided into 5 categories: doctoral-granting universities; comprehensive colleges and universities; general baccalaureate colleges; 2-year colleges, and separate specialized professional schools. The doctoral-granting universities are divided into 3 groups, depending on number of Ph.D. awards granted and amount of federal government support for academic research. The comprehensive colleges and universities are institutions that may have doctoral programs and that offer master's degrees, and have an enrollment of more than 3,500 students. General baccalaureate colleges may award master's degrees and have enrollments under 3,500. Two-year colleges include community colleges, technical institutes, university and college branches, and other campuses offering less than a baccalaureate program. Separate specialized professional schools include Bible colleges and religious seminaries, medical schools, schools of engineering and technology, schools of business, schools of music, art, and design, schools of law and teachers colleges and all others. FOREWORD

There have been two major deficiencies in much of the statistical data and analysis about the colleges and universities of the United States. One such deficiency has been the absence of a useful taxonomy of types of colleges and universities. A second such deficiency has been the lack of a principle of enumeration.

We are fortunate in this country to have the Directory of Institutions of Higher Education which is published annually by the National Center of Educational Statistics of the Office of Education in the federal government. And we are doubly fortunate that this Directory is published with commendable promptness, usually appearing about half-way through the academic year to which it applies.

But the classification structure and the principle of enumeration set forth in this annual Directory leave a good deal to be desired. The reasons for this observation are clearly implied in the material which follows and need not be elaborated here. It is sufficient to comment that there are complexities in establishing common characteristics among institutions of higher education upon which to build an adequate classification scheme.

The Carnegie Commission on Higher Education during its notable inquiry from 1967 through 1973 into the state of health of American higher education as institutional entities decided to develop its own taxonomy of institutional types for its enumerative and analytical purposes. This classification scheme was set forth in the Carnegie Commission report entitled New Students and New Places.[1] This classification scheme is shown on the following page.

Although the Carnegie Commission published the numbers of institutions by each category and enrollment data by category, the Commission did not publish a list of the names of each institution as assigned to its classification scheme. There was very good reason for this omission. Individual colleges and universities would undoubtedly have protested their places in this taxonomy and the Commission could have become involved in endless small arguments which would have sidetracked attention from the major problems the Commission had addressed.

The Carnegie Commission classification scheme was unique in several ways. It attempted both a program distinction and a qualitative distinction among various colleges and universities. Thus, the

Carnegie Classification Scheme

1.0 Doctoral-Granting Institutions

1.1 Heavy emphasis upon research
The fifty leading institutions in terms of federal government academic science support and awarding at least fifty Ph.D.'s in 1967-68.

1.2 Moderate emphasis upon research
The next fifty leading institutions in terms of federal financial support and awarding fifty Ph.D.'s plus M.D.'s in 1967-68.

1.3 Moderate emphais on doctoral programs
Institutions awarding forty or more Ph.D.'s and M.D.'s or receiving at least four million dollars in federal financial support.

1.4 Limited emphasis upon doctoral programs
Institutions awarding at least ten Ph.D.'s in 1967-68.

2.0 Comprehensive Colleges

2.1 Comprehensive Colleges I
Institutions offering liberal arts and "several" other programs, but only an "extremely limited" doctoral program.

2.2 Comprehensive Colleges II
State colleges and some private colleges offering liberal arts and at least one professional program. Did not include private institutions with fewer than 1,500 students or public institutions with fewer than 1,000 students.

3.0 Liberal Arts Colleges

3.1 Liberal Arts Colleges — Selectivity I
Colleges scoring 58 or above on Astin's selectivity index or included among the two hundred leading baccalaureate institutions in terms of their graduates receiving Ph.D.'s at forty leading universities.

3.2 Liberal Arts Colleges — Selectivity II
All other liberal arts colleges.

4.0 All Two-Year Colleges and Institutes

5.0 Professional Schools and Other Specialized Institutions

- 5.1 Theological seminaries, bible colleges, and other institutions offering degrees in religion
- 5.2 Medical schools and medical centers
- 5.3 Other separate health professional schools
- 5.4 Schools of engineering and technology
- 5.5 Schools of business and management
- 5.6 Schools of art, music, design, etc.
- 5.7 Schools of law
- 5.8 Teachers colleges
- 5.9 Other specialized institutions
  Included graduate centers, maritime academies, military institutes, and miscellaneous.

scheme revealed to a greater extent than other classification arrangements the real diversity among institutions of higher education in the United States.

In addition, the Carnegie Commission taxonomy counted each separate campus as an institution. Thus, it classified a total of 2,827 institutions rather than the 2,565 for 1970 as enumerated by the Office of Education. The Office of Education counted multi-campus institutions as one institution, rather than as several which would seem to be the more desirable practice.

The one omission from the Carnegie Commission taxonomy was any indication of the geographical distribution of the various types of higher education institutions. Since the names were not to be published, no geographical distribution was provided, lest this too might offer grounds for argument.

The Importance of Classification

The taxonomy developed by the Carnegie Commission on Higher Education was useful for its own analytical purposes. In the absence of the publication of the names of the institutions and their locations, it could not be used, however, by other researchers or by state government and other planners. The Carnegie Commission classification was suggestive, but not useable by others.

It should be mentioned that in subsequent reports after that of October 1971 the Carnegie Commission did make some minor modifications in its classification scheme. It is not necessary here to trace these changes. In general, the basic outline of the taxonomy as originally developed remained a basic tool in the analytical work of the Commission.

An adequate classification of institutions is very important in higher education analysis and planning. In many instances an inventory of the actual instructional programs offered by various institutions has been lacking. No comparison of enrollment or expenditure data among institutions of higher education in the United States has any validity unless it is made on a program basis. Furthermore, since geographical access has been recognized for some forty years as a major factor in permitting students of different socio-economic status to enroll in higher education, it is very important to know what kinds of instructional and other programs of higher education are located where.

Because the Carnegie Commission classification is suggestive of the variety and dispersion of higher education institutions in the United States, and because this kind of information is essential to governmental and institutional planning, the Management Division of the Academy for Educational Development decided as a means for promoting improved planning practices in the management of higher education to undertake to apply the Carnegie Commission classification to the 1972-73 universe of institutions of higher education.

The first major problem was how to identify this universe. There was only one possible solution. The 1972-73 Office of Education Directory of higher education institutions was used as the source of institutional data.[2] If an institution or a campus was not listed in the 1972-73 Directory, the institution or campus was not enumerated and was not classified by type. To our knowledge, there are some omissions from that Directory, but the fault probably lies with the reporting institutions and not with the Office of Education. In addition, several new institutions have begun operations since the Directory was published and it was not possible to count these either.

We had not proceeded far with our efforts to classify institutions and campuses, however, before it became apparent that the Carnegie Commission taxonomy would have to be modified. We found that in our attempt to use the Commission's classification scheme, we were becoming involved in a good many decisions of subjective judgment. These could only lead to those same arguments which the Carnegie Commission wisely decided to avoid.

Moreover, it must be acknowledged that the program data available from the Office of Education Directory leaves much to be desired. It is not always clear just what undergraduate and graduate professional programs are offered by an institution or by one of the institutional campuses. Furthermore, many so-called liberal arts colleges do in fact have a department of economics and business management and a department of education. Many liberal arts colleges have obtained approval of their teacher education programs from state boards of education in order that their graduates may obtain employment in the public schools. It seems that there are only a few "pure" liberal arts colleges in the United States.

There are problems also when it comes to the whole area of graduate study. Many so-called liberal arts colleges offer at least a master's degree and there are some offering the doctoral degree. There are religious seminaries which offer an undergraduate four-year so-called liberal education program as pre-professional education for the graduate professional education in theology. Many similar kinds of difficulties could be mentioned.

A Modified Taxonomy

In the interests of employing objective criteria for a classification scheme and in order still to suggest program distinctions between institutions, we developed a new taxonomy, one drawing its inspiration from the Carnegie Commission taxonomy and enumeration but one with somewhat fewer categories and one, we hope, with somewhat more precise distinctions. This modified taxonomy is shown on the following page.

The principal five-fold classification of the Carnegie Commission by types of institutions was retained, but the designations were changed and the sub-categories simplified or eliminated in certain instances. There were compelling reasons for these changes.

The category of doctoral-granting universities seems to be a desirable one, but the sub-categories were reduced to three and the distinctions were made as precise as possible. The category is confined to universities and does not include all institutions which may offer doctoral degree programs and award doctoral degrees. Universities were defined as institutions offering undergraduate, graduate, and graduate professional programs, in the arts and sciences generally and in professional fields. Separate graduate centers organized somewhat apart from other colleges were not included herein, nor were separate professional schools (such as those in the health professions, business, engineering, and theology) which also offer and award doctoral degrees.

Taxonomy of Institutions of Higher Education in the United States

1.0 Doctoral-Granting Universities

1.1 Leading Research Universities
The universities which awarded over fifty Ph.D. degrees in 1970-71 and which received over ten million dollars in federal government support of academic science in 1970-71.

1.2 Other Research Universities
The universities which awarded over thirty Ph.D. degrees in 1970-71 and which received over five million dollars in federal government support of academic science in 1970-71.

1.3 Other Doctoral-Granting Universities
All other universities which awarded any doctoral degrees in 1969-70 or 1970-71.

2.0 Comprehensive Colleges and Universities
Institutions which may have doctoral programs (although no Ph.D's were awarded in 1969-71) and which offered master's degrees (except where noted) and had an enrollment of more than 3,500 students.

3.0 General Baccalaureate Colleges
Institutions which may award the master's degree but have enrollments under 3,500 students.

4.0 Two-year Colleges
Community colleges, technical institutes, university and college branches, and other campuses offering less than a baccalaureate program.

5.0 Separate Specialized Professional Schools
5.1 Bible Colleges and Religious Seminaries
5.2 Medical Schools
5.3 Other Health Professions
5.4 Schools of Engineering and Technology
5.5 Schools of Business
5.6 Schools of Music, Art, Design
5.7 Schools of Law

5.8 Teachers Colleges
5.9 Other Specialized Schools
(Includes graduate centers, military academies, and miscellaneous specialized kinds of institutions)

The category of doctoral-granting universities was restricted to universities which did actually award doctoral degrees in 1969-70 or in 1970-71. The data for award of doctoral degrees were taken from two Office of Education publications.[3] Unless at least one doctoral degree had been awarded in one of these two years, we did not list a university as a doctoral-granting university, even though the highest offering as listed in the Directory was a doctoral program. But every university which had awarded a doctoral degree in one of these two years was included in the category; there were no exclusions based upon any arbitrary standard of the number of degrees conferred. We were dependent, of course, upon the accuracy of the available Office of Education data.

The sub-category "leading research universities" was defined upon the basis of two criteria: the award of fifty or more doctoral degrees in 1970-71 and the receipt of more than ten million dollars in federal government support of academic science in 1970-71 as reported by the National Science Foundation.[4] The sub-category "other research universities" was based likewise upon two criteria: the award of thirty or more doctoral degrees in 1970-71 and the receipt of five million dollars or more in federal government support of academic science in 1970-71. The remaining sub-category included all universities awarding at least one doctoral degree in 1969-70 or in 1970-71.

The second principal category, comprehensive colleges and universities, was intended to include institutions offering undergraduate education in the arts and sciences and in two or more professional fields, offering graduate education and awarding master's degrees in 1969-70 (the most recent year for which we had data), and having a sizeable student enrollment, as given in the Directory. We are inclined to believe that the larger an institution of higher education, the more diverse will be its undergraduate and graduate enrollments. Accordingly, we fixed the dividing line between the "comprehensive" and the "general" institution as an enrollment of 3,500 students. This seemed to us to represent a reasonable standard. We made no effort to develop or use any sub-categories for this category.

[3]Mary Evans Hooper, Earned Degrees Conferred 1969-70, Institutional Data, U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (Washington: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1970); and Elfrida L. Burnett, Doctor's Degrees Conferred by All U.S. Institutions: By State, Academic Field, Sex, and Institutions 1961-62 Through 1970-71, January 1973 (Multilithed), Office of Education, U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

[4]National Science Foundation, Federal Support to Universities, Colleges, and Selected Nonprofit Institutions, Fiscal Year 1971, NSF 73-100 (Washington: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1973).

We believe the designation "general baccalaureate college" is more descriptive of an institution than the label "liberal arts college," and as just explained we finally decided upon enrollment size as the principal standard of differentiation between a comprehensive institution and a general baccalaureate college. To be sure, there are colleges and universities in this grouping which award master's degrees and even offer doctoral degrees. We believe, however, that in most instances the smaller colleges and universities under 3,500 students do find it desirable and preferable to give primary emphasis to their undergraduate programs, especially in the arts and sciences, business, and education.

The Carnegie Commission saw fit to divide liberal arts colleges into two sub-categories based essentially upon a selectivity criterion. Presumably this was an effort to suggest qualitative differentiation among the four-year baccalaureate colleges. We decided to drop these two sub-categories. For those who may be interested, however, in the characteristic of selectivity, we have included an asterisk in this grouping showing presence or absence from the selectivity indices as reported by one well-known guide to American colleges and universities.[5]

The two-year colleges category is intended to include, in addition to junior colleges, community colleges, and technical institutes, those university branches offering less than a full-blown baccalaureate program. We found that some state universities were somewhat less than accurate in some instances in indicating the scope of the course offerings at their branch campuses. If some upper-division courses and even some master's degree courses were offered as an "extension" of the home campus programs, then these were listed in the Directory as the highest offering. This practice makes a meaningful classification by types of programs very difficult to achieve. We simply endeavored to classify branch campuses according to the best information available to us from varied sources. This category is in need of much more precise definition and reporting practice.

Finally, we found the Carnegie Commission category of specialized professional schools quite useful, along with its various subcategories. We encountered two major problems, however, in using the definitions along with the data about offerings in the Directory. One problem was how to classify the theological seminary offering an undergraduate education in the liberal arts. Where the small enrollment size of the undergraduate enrollment seemed to suggest that the program was essentially one of "feeding" the graduate professional program in theology, we listed the entire institution as a school of theology.

[5]James Cass and Max Birnbaum, Comparative Guide to American Colleges, 1970-71 edition (New York: Harper and Row, 1969), pp. 827-832.

When it came to defining separate campuses of medicine, we followed the practice of including all colleges of medicine which were located in a different city from that of the main campus of the university. We decided that for all practical purposes the college of medicine located apart from a university's central campus should be considered as a separate college of medicine. In addition, in those instances where the medical center campus included colleges of dentistry, nursing, and even other health professions, we listed the institution first of all as a college of medicine.

Table 1 herewith shows the actual number of institutions, that is, separate campuses, as enumerated in this particular endeavor. We have included all the campuses as indicated in the 1972-73 Directory. The number reaches a total of 2,945. It is noteworthy that the largest categories in terms of institutional count are the two-year colleges and the general baccalaureate colleges.

No taxonomy of types of institutions by program is adequate which does not make a clear distinction between public and private sponsorship. For this reason, the count is in every instance divided between public and private. There is some debate today whether the division between public and private is a meaningful one. The essential difference is two-fold: the method of appointing a majority of the trustees and the extent of subsidy from governmental appropriations available to finance the instruction of students. If a majority of trustees are appointed by public authority (rather than by a self-perpetuating board or by private authority), and if half or more of the cost of instruction of students is provided through governmental funds, a college or university is surely public. But for our purposes we have relied upon the sponsorship as indicated by the 1972-73 Directory.

The campus count in and of itself tells us only a part of the story about higher education in the United States. We are equally interested in knowing where the students are to be found and in what numbers. Table 2 makes use of the enrollment data indicated in the 1972-73 Directory and presents these data in summary form by our classification scheme. There are some very interesting observations to be made from this table. First of all, by type of institution, the enrollment distribution was as follows:

Second, it is noteworthy that seventy-six percent of all enrollments as of 1972 were to be found in the publicly sponsored colleges and universities. Yet at only one type of institution, namely the doctoral-granting university, was the actual distribution between public and private institutions near the 75-25 ratio. The enrollment at public two-year colleges was ninety-five percent of the total, while nearly eighty-seven percent of the enrollment in the so-called comprehensive institutions was to be found in the public institutions. On the other hand, large percentages of the total enrollment in the other two types of institutions — the general baccalaureate colleges (seventy-three percent) and the specialized professional institutions (sixty-eight percent) — were found in private colleges.

In Table 3 we have carried the enrollment data a step farther and have shown the average student enrollment by type of institution. The figure is a simple average, calculated by dividing the total number of students as shown in Table 2 by the total number of institutions as shown in Table 1. Here again there are some interesting observations.

Public institutions tend to be much larger in average enrollment size than the private institutions. For all types, the average sizes are: public — 4,851; private — 1,393. The doctoral-granting institutions have the largest average size, with the leading research universities being the largest in enrollment. The next largest in enrollment are the comprehensive institutions, followed by the two-year colleges. The specialized professional schools are the smallest in enrollment size. It appears that the subject of desirable enrollment in terms of institutional economics deserves careful consideration.

As indicated earlier, a major objective in this classification is to provide management planning data about the location of various types of higher education institutions in the United States. Accordingly, the major institutional types were distributed among the fifty states, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the outlying territories of the United States. These data are presented in Table 4 at the conclusion of this foreword.

In the instance of the separate professional schools, since the number is dominated by theological seminaries and bible colleges, this sub-category has been shown separately. Otherwise, all the separate professional schools have been grouped together, the only subdivision being that of public and private.

Once again there are various observations to be drawn from the table. For example, every state contains at least one doctoral-granting university, although twenty states do not have a leading research university within their boundaries. On the other hand, there are seven leading research universities located in California, three in Illinois, three in Massachusetts, two in Michigan, two in Missouri, two in New Jersey, six in New York, three in North Carolina, two in Ohio, four in Pennsylvania, and two in Texas.

The geographical distribution of private general baccalaureate colleges is noteworthy. There are fifty-five such colleges in Pennsylvania, fifty-two in New York, thirty-six in Illinois, thirty-eight in Ohio, thirty in California, and thirty in Texas.

In twenty-nine states, the number of public two-year institutions is the largest of any type. In ten more states, public two-year institutions are outnumbered only by private general baccalaureate colleges — Georgia, Indiana, Maine, Missouri, Nebraska, New York, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, West Virginia, and Wisconsin. Two states, Iowa and Louisiana, have equal numbers of each. The other nine states have a very small number of public two-year institutions or, in the case of South Dakota, none at all.

The seminaries and bible colleges are concentrated very heavily in a very few states, and, indeed, in a very few cities. The largest numbers are in New York (thirty-seven), California (twenty-five), Pennsylvania (twenty-one), Illinois (fifteen), and Missouri (fourteen). The same general pattern holds true for other specialized professional institutions, except that Massachusetts, relatively devoid of bible schools and seminaries, has nineteen public and private specialized professional institutions.

The states with the greatest total number of institutions of higher education are, quite predictably, those states with the largest populations. Eight states have more than one hundred institutions: California (231), Illinois (149), Massachusetts (121), New York (245), North Carolina (116), Ohio (124), Pennsylvania (177), and Texas (140). North Carolina is the only state on this list which does not have a major population center.

In conclusion, it must be emphasized that higher education in the United States is a dynamic, not a static, phenomenon. The 1973-74 Directory will undoubtedly list new campuses and drop some others which will have gone out of operation. In addition, enrollments change, program offerings change, federal government support of academic science varies from year to year, and the number of degrees awarded will fluctuate.

Any enumeration and classification of 1972-73 institutions depending in part upon 1970-71 data will not be adequate for 1973-74 or subsequent years. These data are published simply as a beginning, as an indication of essential planning information for higher education management. A one-time inventory will not suffice. Only a continuously maintained inventory can be adequate.

Moreover, the classification has only one primary utility. It provides an indication of what kinds of institutions with which experiences might usefully be analyzed or compared. The experience of all higher education institutions as a whole means very little. It is the experience of institutions with similar characteristics which may be meaningful.

This classification by no means provides a full indication of the various characteristics of institutions of higher education. It is only the beginning in the search for common attributes and common experience.

MANAGEMENT DIVISION PUBLICATIONS

BY 1990: DOUBLED ENROLLMENTS, TRIPLED COSTS. Charts showing the chronic financial squeeze with which most urban universities will have to learn to live.

MEETING THE FINANCIAL PINCH AT ONE UNIVERSITY. The university is Princeton; the saving—one million dollars—reflects the impact of Provost William Bowen's incisive memorandum explaining why the University needed to tighten its belt.

BLACK STUDIES: HOW IT WORKS AT TEN UNIVERSITIES. After the ideological furor dies down, there are these management problems to solve: organization, faculty, money.

319 WAYS COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES ARE MEETING THE FINANCIAL PINCH. An expanded check-list of practices being used right now to save money and increase income.

THE ADVANTAGES OF WORK-STUDY PLANS. In addition to helping balance a university budget, work-study can attract capable students who need a chance to earn their way, and make education more relevant for all students.

SURVIVAL THROUGH CHANGE. A case study of a privately supported urban university's plan to fight the budget squeeze.

A GUIDE TO PROFESSIONAL DEVELOPMENT OPPORTUNITIES FOR COLLEGE AND UNIVERSITY ADMINISTRATORS. Third expanded edition of a handbook identifying over 125 useful workshops, conferences, internships and fellowships scheduled for 1973.

RESCUE BEGINS AT HOME. Highlights of To Turn the Tide (Father Paul C. Reinert, President of St. Louis University), including an 11 - point self-help plan other institutions can follow.

PUTTING COOPERATION TO WORK. A survey of how voluntary cooperation is helping colleges and universities.

PERSONNEL MANAGEMENT IN HIGHER EDUCATION. Three papers discussing general scope and problems, focusing on the current issues of tenure and collective bargaining, and suggesting ways to decrease costs.

HIGHER EDUCATION WITH FEWER TEACHERS. A survey of colleges and universities which have recently increased their student-faculty ratio to 20 to 1 or more, for those who are considering such a change and wondering how class size affects quality.

THE CONTRIBUTIONS OF BUSINESS MANAGEMENT TO HIGHER EDUCATION MANAGEMENT. Report of a seminar, in which higher education administrators learned from business experience without losing sight of differences between the two institutions.

FINANCING CURRENT OPERATIONS OF AMERICAN HIGHER EDUCATION. An analytical framework for comparing and contrasting the income and expenditures of publicly and privately supported colleges and universities.

ALTERNATIVES IN STATE GOVERNMENT FINANCING OF HIGHER EDUCATION. A description and comparison of various state approaches to the financing of students and institutions and the problems and policy decisions confronting them.

RESOURCE REALLOCATION IN RESEARCH UNIVERSITIES. Case studies of five research universities that reorganized their planning and budgeting efforts.

SYSTEMS MODELS AND PROGRAMS FOR HIGHER EDUCATION. A catalogue of management information systems and computer simulation models available for higher education current operations and long-range planning.

LET'S END THE CONFUSION ABOUT SIMULATION MODELS! A report of the Spring Conference of the Society for College and University Planning, including general discussion of simulation models and case-studies of simulation models at various campuses.

CONFRONTING THE NEW DEPRESSION IN HIGHER EDUCATION. Two budget exercises developed by John D. Millett, Director of the Management Division, one for "Principal College," and the other for "Major University."

A SURVIVAL KIT FOR INVISIBLE COLLEGES. The story of how one "invisible" college has met the challenge of staying alive in the period of crisis in higher education, by the President of Aquinas College, Norbert J. Hruby.

MANAGEMENT FORUM. Management Division newsletter containing articles and papers on higher education management and planning; each issue covers one or two current topics.

SINGLE COPIES OF ALL MANAGEMENT DIVISION PUBLICATIONS ARE FREE. There will be a charge for quantity orders. We will be pleased to provide, at your request, information on those charges.
